“As the new president of Centenary University, I have assembled a talented team that is poised to bring this university to a new level of prominence,” Caldwell said. “Jordan Glatt is a well-respected entrepreneur and public servant. His dynamic background in developing effective strategic initiatives will make a tremendous impact at Centenary as we shape the next era at this university.”

Glatt most recently served as special assistant to the president for strategic partnerships at Lodi-based Felician University, as well as director of strategic partnerships for the Community Foundation of New Jersey. In the for-profit sector, he was the chief marketing officer and director of Free All Media LLC, charged with developing a first-of-its kind business model and identifying investors for a social media ad startup. Glatt also was the longtime CEO and president of Magla Products, an international consumer products company providing nationally branded goods to leading hardware, grocery and drug retailers including Walmart, Sam’s Club, Lowe’s and Target.

He has also made a significant impact in local and state government. In his current role as the first New Jersey Shared Services co-czar, Glatt was appointed by Gov. Phil Murphy to lead a statewide initiative to reduce costs and lower property taxes through the implementation of shared services agreements among towns and county agencies. Glatt also served for eight years as mayor of Summit, where he was previously a common councilman at large.

A graduate of Madison-based Drew University, Glatt has participated in advanced educational opportunities at Harvard Business School.
